Non-Contractual Society: A Feminist View

The model of society by Virginia Held aims at promoting ethics of care to everyone in society since it is a moral theory. Likewise, this model of society also fully supports morality society. In this paper, I will state my thoughts on Virginia's model of society, why it is a good way of convincing society and what Held's model adds to our concept of the relationship in society. Additionally, the problems with accepting this model and the effect this theory will have on moral behaviour in society.

My thoughts on Virginia's model of the society include positive and negative at the same time. By positive thinking, I mean supporting what ethics entails in general. Ethics of care deals with social issues, including gender-based violence in society, which gives positive insights into the theory. Likewise, ethics is better than the Kantian theory since it is more caring (Cahn, 2020). The negative thought of the model reveals that virtuous female individuals in society are not essential compared to relations. Dealing with social issues is a good way of conceiving society since it promotes personal development.

The model adds ethics of care to the concept of the relationship in society. It shows that people will learn to relate in a caring way with others in society.

Equality and justice in society will be offered, advocated for and fit in with care so that people will be offered fair and equal opportunities to both females and males. According to Held, ethics of care will impact society to promote peaceful relations with each other to create a good ground for justice in society (Cahn, 2020).

The problem with accepting this model is competition and moral development is a positive effect this theory will have on moral behaviour in society.

Competition in a society will lead to strained relationships between various individuals. Additionally, competition is a factor that limits the personal growth of individuals since individuals lack peace of mind. Moral development in individuals is brought about by interpersonal factors, including families and culture (Cahn, 2020). This theory emphasizes ethics of care that promote the moral development of an individual.

In this paper, my thoughts on Virginia's model of society, the reason it is a good way of conceiving society and what Held's model adds to our concept of the relationship in society. Additionally, the problems with accepting this model and the effect this theory will have on moral behaviour in society.
